

Violence on TV is not what needs to be addressed. Violence in everyday life needs to be addressed. Parents have the ability and responsibility to govern what their children watch. The TV doesn't teach right from wrong to children, parents instill that value. It is not the responsibility of the general populace to govern and restrict what should or should not be seen on television. There's a simple channel button or the on/off switch that gives people the right to choose.

Parents need to understand the power of television and if it's influence can directly affect their children. If they cannot keep their children from watching appropriate content they should reconsider their part in raising a child. If TV is the primary teaching influence to a young child there is something very wrong with the way family upbringing has become in America. If better parenting isn't the norm then violence in every day life will continue to be more prominent.

Maybe the FCC should be looking at how to promote better parenting instead of trying to be the parent.
